It's nice to find some cash tucked into the pocket of your spring jacket or squirreled away in an old wallet.

But don't forget about accounts you have at the credit union or other financial institutions. If you're not using the account, after a certain time period, you may be charged inactive fees.

Eventually, if you don't respond to attempts to find you and there are funds remaining, the money will be turned over to the state treasury, a process known as escheatment.

You can avoid losing track of your money by keeping your account active - depositing and withdrawing funds or setting up an automatic transfer or scheduled payment. Also, make sure your contact information is up-to-date.
